

The patient-physician relationship is changing under managed care

The need for cost containment and the movement toward managed care have restructured traditional roles among patients, physicians and health care organizations. The authors provide background on the shifts in the traditional patient-physician relationship and the benefits, challenges and responsibilities of working in a managed care environment. As the VA adopts managed care strategies, these issues will have important consequences for medical school and residency training programs in the VA.

Kerr EA, Clancy CM. Defining educational priorities in managed care: A symposium overview. Journal of General Internal Medicine. 1999; 14(Supplement 1):S1-S5. Contact: Eve Kerr, MD, (734) 930-5100, e-mail at ekerr@umich.edu.